Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is a well known technique for obtaining images of the human body. The technique is based on the principle that nuclear spins of certain atoms in a human body are excited by an external magnetic field, and the resulting magnetic resonance (MR) signals can be detected. The external magnetic field may be provided by an MR device such as, for example, the MRI or a tomograph. MR imaging is a unique diagnostic imaging technique which can produce high contrast images of soft tissue without the use of ionizing radiation. The nuclear spins of hydrogen atoms (1H) in water molecules in the human body primarily emit MR signals at a resonant frequency of approximately 400 MHz. However, water molecules are only a small part of the human body, and other
