Incredibly, it went down last month. It's not a huge deal, but it is a sign that the market is changing. We now see "REITs" being treated like stocks in an attempt to inflate their market capitalization. As we've seen, that was never a good idea. There's really only a handful of stocks that can be considered "REITs." At the end of 2017, there were about a dozen. Now there are about eight. And even then, we're missing out on a lot of good companies. If anything, the "REITization" and the rise of the "REIT" have pushed more ETFs to the sidelines. However, because the market has become larger and more crowded, the ability for new ETFs to make it to market has been greatly limited. Sure, there are companies out there who are excited about building new ETFs. But the whole environment is changing. Consider the ETF world in the early 1990s. Back then, there were only a handful of ETFs out there. And then there were ETFs specialized in something else. You had real estate, technology, and telecom (TEL) ETFs. And then along came a couple other categories. The value ETF is probably the biggest one. Value ETFs don't have the same diversification that more traditional ETFs have. They basically trade based on value. This includes REITs, which is the whole point of REITs. The other growth category is just called "Growth." This is because "Growth" could mean anything. It could mean just overall demand. It could mean the type of company. It could mean the sector. There are dozens of ETFs in this category. It is more diverse, but not as diversified as the real estate ETFs. Things have now really come full circle. There's a reason ETFs don't go down in value. They provide that diversification that is so important to investors. In order to provide that diversification, they need to continue to make more and more markets available for them.
