Reconstruction of pilon fractures. We have attempted to reconstruct the talar neck and avascular area by closed method, and have tried to evaluate the results. In the former part of the study, the talar neck and body were reconstructed in 48 cases by closed methods, and in the latter, the talar neck only was reconstructed in 30 cases by closed method and in 14 cases by open methods. Reconstructive treatment of the talar neck and body resulted in good stabilization and restoration of the articular function. After an average follow-up of 4.2 years, the mean stability of the ankle was 90% and the mean loss of the talar height was 10%. Seeing the written word on a grainy black-and-white screen in 1920s Chicago, this "Chicago Daily News," to an audience of that era, was like watching a traveling movie. By 1929, it had moved into a hulking office building in the heart of the Loop, reports the Chicago Tribune. It was the headquarters of the federal building commission, and perhaps no matter where one worked, if one didn't, one eventually worked at the Daily News. But 1920s Chicago was not a back-to-the-land kind of year for newspapers. Fewer than 300,000 people were getting their newspapers outside the house, according to the Tribune. Those who cared about the newspaper were paying a dollar a week for a copy of the Telegram. The Daily News, on the other hand, was a fairly stodgy affair. "It's the most read dull newspaper in town," one woman called it to the Tribune, "and that's all right with me. I enjoy it." She was right, too. The Tribune and the Daily News seemed as separate as the Tribune Tower and the Daily News Publishing Company building, and the stories of the two appeared to be pretty different. The Daily News's main focus, usually, was the stock market. On Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays, it published the results of the close of the previous trading day. If one was interested in a quick read that was still packed with financial information, the Daily News was the newspaper for it. If one wanted to read about the gritty underbelly of the market, the Tribune was the one to turn to. But the Tribune did have certain things in its favor, starting with its origins. The newspaper was

The effects of a metronome on convergence of tracking error and time during smooth pursuit. To investigate the effect of a metronome during human smooth pursuit eye movements, we measured the tracking errors and the time required to converge on the target during pursuit of a target that was either moving in the same direction as the pursuit eye movement or in the opposite direction to the pursuit eye movement. The subject was required to track either the metronome in the opposite direction or the target in the same direction as the eye movement. The direction of eye movement was constrained with a fixation display at the end of a pursuit trace. The subject was instructed to maintain fixation while the gaze was controlled by the pursuit eye movement. The speed of the pursuit trace was varied from 10 to 70 degrees/s. The average tracking error or the length of the pursuit trace was determined as a function of the pursuit rate. When the target was moving in the same direction as the pursuit eye movement, the tracking error decreased with the increase in the rate of pursuit. When the target was moving in the opposite direction to the pursuit eye movement, the tracking error decreased only at pursuit rates greater than 40 degrees/s. The length of the pursuit trace increased with the increase in the rate of pursuit. The lengths were greater when the target was moving in the same direction as the pursuit eye movement than when the target was moving in the opposite direction. The time required to converge on the target during smooth pursuit increased with the increase in the rate of pursuit. The time increased when the target moved in the same direction as the pursuit eye movement than when the target moved in the opposite direction. When the target moved in the same direction as the pursuit eye movement, the average tracking error or the length of the pursuit trace and the time required to converge on the target decreased with the increase in the rate of pursuit. When the target moved in the opposite direction to the pursuit eye movement, the average tracking error, length of the pursuit trace and the time required to converge on the target increased as the pursuit rate was increased. We suggest that the effect of the metronome on the eye movements is due to the concurrent signal to pursue and to make an accurate eye movement. We discuss how the effect of the metronome may be involved in re-entrant saccades and eye-tracking errors, and demonstrate how our results are consistent with the common assumption that the pursuit of a target is governed by a cascade of subunits in the central nervous system.
