That was a good Indian movie, and I can see why Gandhi gave it."If your main function in life is to get laid, then you have the wrong job." - R. Buckminster Fuller I recently had the pleasure of reading a book "The Decoupling of Money", published in 2006 by Robert Murphy and then recently updated, where he analyzes the direction and trends of the global financial system. The book presents an examination of the increasing separation of two forms of "money": official money and "real money". As Robert Murphy argues, while conventional money tends to be created (in the form of a treasury or central bank's currency) by the state, real money is a much less controlled and manipulated commodity with its value determined by the market. It is the actual ability to buy or sell something in the world that defines money, and it is that ability which may become decoupled from the means of its creation. The book predicts that as real money plays a greater role, gold and other precious commodities will be displaced by a less controlled system of "crypto-gold" coins which act as a digital equivalent of physical money, in contrast to the chaotic and often manipulated system of conventional money. There are already cases of a greater correlation between the value of an asset and the ability to actually trade that asset in the world than with the money supply. For example, since the introduction of the euro in 1999, the largest price-index for the Eurozone is the German Mark (DEM). Even though the German mark was actually devalued two years prior to 6d1f23a050
